

The most commonly accepted definition of stress is that stress is a condition or feeling experienced when a person perceives that "demands exceed the personal and social resources the individual is able to mobilise."